HE KILLED FOUR MEN.

Did the Job Conscientiously in One Day.

MR. HUDSPETH ON HORSEBACK.

In Search of Material for a Magazine Article—thinks He Has Found His Man.

[FOR THE SUNDAY HERALD—Copyrighted.]

Hammerhead Hudspeth had long contemplated the writing of a magazine article. But he hardly knew how to set about it. He wanted to write something that should be new, and, therefore, he was not content with stirring up the dry straw of periodical literature. One night Hudspeth and a friend, a young man of blooming thought, if not of ripe suggestion, were sitting together when the friend asked:

"Have you done anything with that magazine article yet?"

"No, I haven't, and it worries me, too. I know that if I should get a good sketch into one of the leading magazines my literary status would be permanently fixed. But I must have something distinctly new."

"But wouldn't its distinctive newness militate against its publication in a magazine?"

"I don't know about that, but if I should get the aid of a magazine's dignity, the public would settle the matter, and I really believe that I should be famous."

"What you want is something that shall be strikingly American, and I have thought that you might go into some out-of-the-way place and pick up a few characters that would startle the idealists and grab the admiration of the idealists. With your delicate touch you could place a wreath of beauty about the brow of a rugged old woodsman into a ludicrous sublimity of color. What the reading world wants is character. Conventional types are alike the world over, and to command attention you must have catchy strangeness. Go over into Felton county, Ky., where I used to live, and dig up a good mind of character. Say, how would this sort of man do for a hero? Strong fellow with numerous prejudices and with physical courage to shove them?"

"He has killed a number of men, but has been strictly conscientious in the work, believing that he had simply discharged his duty; in fact, he is an unconscious bully. You can easily find such a man."

"He would be a novelty in a way, but desperate men have been made the subject of a thousand sketches."

"Yes, desperate men, but not a man unconsciously desperate. When you once get your model, you can make him anything you like."

"Yes, that's so," said Hudspeth, "but it will be a good deal of trouble to find him."

"Of course, and what is the perfection of an art? It is the making of a very deep trouble. Hire a good horse and go ahead."

"An ordinary horse would do."

"There you go, trimming the edges of your coming fame. Get the best horse you can find, for you may need it. I was just about to tell you that he would, and a few days later he set out for Kentucky to search for his peculiar hero. He crossed the Felton county line late in the afternoon, and had gone but a short distance when he overtook an old fellow riding a steer."

Hudspeth and John Brown.

"That's a queer steer you've got," said Hudspeth, riding alongside the old fellow.

"Yep, but he's the best I kin do under the circumstances. Wife and daughter has got one horse and gone a camp meetin' and my son at bat got 'tuther an' gone to the still house to see if he couldn't get a half a gallon to last us over Sunday, and as I thought it was about the time of year for me to go to the peachtree, I colch up this steer and rid over. Didn't git no letter, though."

"Were you expecting one?"

"Well, yes, rather. My wife's got a sister livin' in Clay county, and we writ to her about five years ago, and we sorter thought it was about time she was answerin' it, but she never was no mighty smart at a thing of that sort."

"Pretty tough country you've got peached here?"

"Yes, arter, but I reckon we've got about as fine a lot of folks as you ever seed."

"I shouldn't wonder. By the way, I have come among you on a most peculiar mission."

"Preacher, I reckon."

"No; for quite another purpose; and now that I am here I am inclined to believe that I am engaged in a wild goose chase. Indeed, I am almost persuaded that a man who pretended to advise me for my future good has put up a job on me. Do you know what a literary sketch is?"

"Well, I have done so much knowin' about in my time that I mout have seed one, but if I did I don't know it."

"It is a piece of writing that isn't true, but which may or may not sound like the truth. I had thought of writing one and would like to get some strange sort of man to write about; some man, for instance, who has killed a good many men and who thought that he was doing rightly. Did you ever kill anybody?"

"No; but I've been in as many law suits as might any man you ever seed."

"I can see now what folly it was for me to come here."

to come here. Do you know of any man that would serve my purpose?"

"Yes; but I don't like to tell about him. And why not?"

"Well, he's my brother; that's the reason."

"You don't say so?"

"I'll bet I do."

"He has killed men, has he?"

"I should say he has."

"How far does he live from here?"

"About twenty miles down this road."

"Did you ever see him kill anybody?"

"Seed him kill 'em in one day."

"Well, he's getting to be interesting. Tell me about it."

"Well, he was in town an' had it in fur them fellers, as the sayin' goes. They was fixed for him, and he knowed it, but it didn't skeer him a bit. Walked right up an' lit in 'em killed all fo' of them in short order, I tell you."

"Was anything done with him?"

"No; that was a good deal of talk, but nothin' wa'n't done."

"Does it seem to you as if your brother's mind—does he appear to regret it?"

"No; never hear him say nothin' about it."

"Well, he is a peculiar character."

"Yes; but he don't like to have a man talk to him about it."

"Will you give me a line of introduction to him?"

"I don't know exactly how to do that, but you jest go to his house and tell him that you've met his brother John and it will be all right. His name is Lige Brown."

"Did you ever see him?"

"Not unless you ride mighty peart. You kin stop at somebody's house along in the stack of the oven and stay all night, an' then you kin git thar in good time tomorrow."

Hudspeth meets Lige Brown.

"I'll do that. Say, your brother doesn't seem to regard himself as a bad man, does he?"

"Wall, I reckon not, fur he 'lows that he is the peacablest man in the country."

"I'm much obliged to you, sir, and I will go at once to his house."

After staying over night at a tumble-down house and after making inquiries at a village through which he passed, Hudspeth reached Lige Brown's place at noon time. The old fellow was sitting in the door, in the shade of a vine, when Hudspeth rode up. He cordially invited the young man in, to sit down, and putting aside a Chicago subscription book which he had been reading—"The Silvery Pathway to Our Golden Home"—showed the visitor into a clean-swept sitting room.

"Now, jest set down and make yourself perfectly at home, sah. You find me all alone as my folks are visitin', but I'll do the best I can for you. I was just about to put dinner—such as it is, mind you—on the table when you rode up, and now if you'll excuse me for a few minutes while I sorter fix things we'll eat a snack."

He went into another room and Hudspeth sat looking after him in astonishment. Could it be possible that this quiet and obliging man had spilled human blood? Had that old steer-riding played a prank? Lige Brown asked a blessing at the table and then "hopped" a slab of shote on Hudspeth's plate.

"By the way," said the visitor, "you have a brother living about twenty miles from here?"

"Yes, my brother John."

"I met him yesterday and he told me a good deal about you."

"Yes, John think's there ain't nobody in the world like me."

"I presume not, but—er—but will you pardon me if I ask you a question concerning him?"

"Surely, sah; fire away."

"Well, I don't like to ask it, but is he a truthful man?"

"John is the very soul of truth, sah. In fact, he has always been too truthful for his own good."

This was interesting news. Lige Brown was, indeed, an unconscious bully. "Are the people about here very peaceable, Mr. Brown?"

"Ah, a peaceable people as you ever seed."

"Then I suppose I needn't ask if you ever have any trouble with them?"

"Never had any trouble with a man in my life, sah."

"What! Er, excuse me, but didn't you say that your brother John is a truthful man?"

"I certainly said so, and you must excuse me, now, but I don't want no man to hint that he ain't."

Here was a situation. Could it be that Lige was a liar?

"Oh, I'm not hinting that your brother is untruthful."

"Glad to hear it, sah."

Hudspeth realized that it would not be safe to question this man any further and took his leave soon after dinner. He had his horse, barring a few hitches, and was resolved to use him. He did not go far when he met a man in the road.

"Have you a few moments to spare, sir?" Hudspeth asked.

"Yes, but very few, as my flock is waitin' for me, a preacher."

"Yes, sir; with conscience in one hand and the book in the other."

"Well, I'll detain you long. Do you know John Brown, who lives some eighteen or twenty miles from here?"

"Yes, mighty well."

"Is he a truthful man?"

"As truthful as any man I ever know, sir."

"Well, do you know his brother Lige?"

"Know him as well as I do anybody."

"Is he a peaceable man?"

"No man could be more so."

"But he fights when quarrels are shoved on him, doesn't he?"

"If he ever did I never heard of it."

Hudspeth exclaimed:

"Understand what?"

"Why, John Brown told me that he saw his brother Lige kill four men one day—"
